Health is political because the right to "a standard of living adequate for health and well-being" ( United Nations, 1948) is, or should be, an aspect of citizenship and a human right. Ultimately, health is political because power is exercised over it as part of a wider economic, social and political system.

Public health and politics are two sides of the same coin. Just combining the words "public" and "health" makes a clear statement that health can only be achieved by the concerted action of many people who must work together in pursuit of a common goal. Acknowledging this raises questions, though: How should they work together?
